

Moving right along. . .

Well, folks, it's been fun, but I must be going. No, seriously, it has been fun, and they'd have to pry the newsletter from my cold, dead hands if it weren't for a couple of things I believe (1) It's better if editorial positions change hands every once in a while; and (2) If I don't quit the newsletter I'll have to quit my PhD program. So the newsletter it is.

Many people have given me help and support, without which I probably couldn't have continued my editorship for four years. First of course are all the people who submitted articles and agreed to be interviewed. Thanks also go to all of the PragSIG officers, particularly Donna Tatsuki, Donna Fujimoto, Sayoko Yamashita, Megumi Kawate Mierzejewska, and Tim Greer. In the non-officer category, Debra Occhi contributed many reports, ideas, and subjects for interviewing, probably only partly because her office is down the hall from mine and she can't escape me. Akiko Hagiwara, who became Journal Watch editor one year ago, regularly contributes interesting and amusing looks at pragmatic research.

So I leave the newsletter in the very capable hands of Sybil Armstrong, who will introduce herself in the next issue. I'm looking forward to seeing the directions she takes it, and to involving myself in PragSIG in other ways. Meanwhile, I'll be working on this stupid dissertation that I am never going to finish.

Thanks for reading and writing for four years!

Anne
